My father was so much more than an alcoholic, the crazy, wild child. He was the kindest sweetest soul I have ever met. He worked day in day out often alone for his kids. If you needed a shirt he'd give you the one off his back. He had cancer in his body and major depression but still looked out for everyone else around him. He believed life can be simple and beautiful. The world didn't deserve him. I took so much time against him over a disagreement. Now I'll never hear his voice again. We lost him because he put every single soul above his own needs. He was a caregiver to his wife and his four children. He made minimum pay stretching to make ends meet for those five people. He deserved more than what this world had to give him. His heart was the most beautiful thing about him. If only he had just taken care of himself sometimes he'd still be here I hate that he's not. But he's finally at peace no longer in pain struggling or suffering. He was there for me everytime I fell down with kind words and gestures. "It's only going up from here." Now looking back at that quote he knew his time was only dissolving.
